PREFACE.

The disposal of the famous Tewksbury Collection is a subject of the deepest interest to a very substantial portion of the community. Announcement seems almost unnecessary that no public sale has ever before been held in New York that equals in intrinsic value or artistic beauty the treasures contained in this old and beautiful residence.

Collections like that gathered by Mr. Lewis G. Tewksbury are extremely rare; for seldom it is that the true art instinct and the capacity for acquiring wealth are so happily blended in one individuality as in himself.

Largely for his own personal gratification in the possession of things that charm the senses, the one-time wealthy Wall Street speculator fulfilled his desires to the limit. His travels extended over land and water, as wide as the horizon. Thus every continent and the faraway islands of Southern and Northern seas have contributed in one form or another to a really remarkable assembly of art treasures. It is an assembly possessing the merit not only of originality but oddity; one that not only reflects the artistic temperament in skill and perfect harmony of detail, but one that leaps, contrastingly, to weird and startling effects; yet withal a consistency of detail and clever arrangement whatever the idea to be wrought.

It was partly Mr. Tewksbury's ambition to gather a collection and to have a house to put it in that would be talked about. In this he succeeded. It is presumably fair to suppose in the interior arrangements of this house its counterpart is not anywhere—at least in the United States.

Mr. Tewksbury was his own architect in the promulgation of ideas. He built a strange house, full of rooms of various areas and divers use; nooks and corners and angles, secret passage-ways, galleries about a beautiful court; embellished these rooms with rare and expensive woods, marbles, leathers, weaves and textures, mirrors and what not, until it became veritably a museum of art, dim of the light of heaven (from the fewness of its windows) but aglow in the brightest noonday with brilliant artificial illumination.

Detailed description of such elegance fails of its purpose. Let the eye judge for itself. Let also, in passing, mention be made of the sharp contrasts of the interior. It is interesting to know that under the roof, in a tower-like room, is a replica of what might be called a bungalow; or, if imagination is disposed to soar, a hunter's domicile. Mr. Tewksbury called it his "den." There, when he gathered his friends, he delighted in talking "horse." But whatever the room might be likened unto, it is really a composite picture, perhaps in part a copy of some curious room the broker had seen in his travels, and added thereto a few touches of his own.

One side of this room is fitted with a huge stone fireplace, from whose crevices reptiles peer and startle. There are, too, armor devices and odd decorations in multiple form; easy chairs and rest-inviting divans. Over all this a canopy falls in graceful folds, concealing here and there the figure of a woman in graceful attitude.

Descend below stairs and one sees a weather-stained door of massive size, barred and locked by heavy hardware of strange pattern, rusted and age-stained. Turn the great key, shove back bars and bolts, descend a few steps. You are in the wine cellar—exact copy of an old French monastery cellar just outside of Paris, 500 years old. The door and other parts herein came from that monastery. The door is almost as old as the monastery. It cost a pretty penny. With the door were imported 300 German spiders to weave webs and make this New York cellar take on the Old World atmosphere. The spiders fulfilled their mission.

More conventional is the Turkish Room on the first floor, whose fittings and decorations represent an outlay of $35,000.

A Fountain Room, Roman in design and decoration, with galleries above, is a striking feature of the house. In brief, wherever the eye may rest, there some object is to attract or enchain. Every nook and corner holds some example of ancient or modern art. It may be a Benares lamp, of curious design, with mystic symbols; a piece of tapestry, whose value runs into the thousands; a porcelain, worth its weight in gold; a canvas, such as Mosler's "Husking Bee," for which Mr. Tewksbury once refused $25,000, or Inness's "Sundown." Again, a delicate and exquisite oil or water color lends a charming view. Here one sees a bit of statuary, delicately chiseled, the work of a famous sculptor; there, a deep-toned musical clock; up above, a ceiling of Cupids, mythological subject, or tracery of flowers. Now ancient armor confronts; beyond a pair of rare Corean antique vases, and glorious powder blues. What better treat than they? Here, there, everywhere, is something of interest, more or less deep.

The wonder is, you say, that one man, busy in the world of speculation and enterprise, could have found time to develop and follow to such completeness the desires of the art side of his nature.

Note.—This perhaps is one of the best-known bronzes in this city. After receiving a first medal in the Salon at Paris, it was brought to New York by Tiffany & Co., and exhibited in their window for many months. The press took it up, and a great many people visited Tiffany's to view this work of art. I am not exaggerating when I say this piece of bronze is one of the most beautifully modeled works of art. The conception itself is good. This noble son of the Western hemisphere, earning his existence through the keenness of his extremely sensitive nature. It can be readily seen by his poisure that he has seen some living object that is soon to be his. In the back of canoe can be seen a fox and crane that he has skillfully tied to his anchor rope. In becoming the owner of this work of art Mr. Tewskbury again displayed his master mind. Price had no object. In the preparation of bronze great care has to be taken to prevent the tin used in its production to be burned away or wasted during the fusion of the mixed metals in the furnace. As little air as possible is admitted, as otherwise the metal would oxidize and the alloy becomes deteriorated. Bronze, when well made, with the exception of gold, platinum and rare metals, is the most durable metallic material known, and its extreme hardness renders it difficult for time to effect. Thus it will be appreciated that the production of perfect bronze is really seen.
